Curious as to what a ‘T-Shaped’ graduate equates to in today’s ever-changing education sector?

To explain the term in simple words, T-Shaped graduates are adaptable and open to multiple disciplines. They don’t limit their skills to a niche subject, they embrace the era of diversity and adopt a multitude of professional techniques.

In broader terms, the team over at T-Summit (<http://tsummit.org/>) have established a descriptive definition (<http://tsummit.org/t>) of the phrase, “Currently higher education is producing I-shaped graduates or students with deep disciplinary knowledge. T-shaped professionals are characterised by their deep disciplinary knowledge in at least one area, an understanding of systems, and their ability to function as ‘adaptive innovators’ and cross the boundaries between disciplines.”

As the T-Summit team adds, “Over the past decade, research has emphasised the need for today’s young professionals to possess deep disciplinary knowledge along with a keen ability to communicate across social, cultural and economic boundaries. These ‘T-shaped professionals’ are in high demand for their ability to innovate, build relationships, advance research and strengthen their organisations.”

In the fields of law, aspiring professionals are currently on the hunt for higher education providers that will transform their I-shaped skills into T-shaped expertise.

As an ambitious legal practitioner, it’s essential for you to keep your options open and level-up your legal expertise at every given chance. With a breadth of knowledge across multiple disciplines to boast to future employers and a commitment to professional growth, you won’t be limiting your potential.

By tying your talents to a forward-thinking law school, you’ll soon evolve into a creative legal thinker who has the motivation to complete a Master of Laws (LLM) and the chance to engage with experiential learning activities.

The T-Summit (<http://tsummit.org/t>) conference team also explain that, “Upon graduation, students should be able to handle information from multiple sources, advance professional relationships across different organizations, contribute innovatively to organizational practices, and communicate with understanding across social, cultural, economic and scientific disciplines.”

To become an effective T-Shaped law graduate, you should choose a legal institution that’s devoted to student success and academic excellence. By advancing in a variety of disciplines, you’ll develop your growth mindset and empower your legal career. It’s a win-win situation!
